Not illustrated. 1875 Excerpt: ... fig. 8, male). The first two joints are short and thick, annular; on the under side of the third is a small hairy knob, and on the upper side, at the apex, a branching process covered with hairs, like that of a stags horn, and half as long again as the joint itself; similar processes are found on the fourth, fifth, and sixth joints, decreasing successively in size, 60 that that on the sixth joint only just projects from the apex; the seventh joint is, at the end, somewhat more pointed above than below; the eighth is simply cylindrical; and the ninth awl-shaped. Both the knob and the branches are wanting in the female (fig. 8, female); but the third, fourth, fifth, and sometimes the sixth, joints are somewhat expanded above: they terminate obliquely at the apex, and have a fine pointed spine on the projecting upper side. The saw and ovipositor of the female are very similar to those of Cladius albipes, but are a little broader, and the points with which the former is armed are finer and sharper. Cladius difformis has been taken with us in various localities, and will probably be found to be common wherever roses are cultivated. Additions to the List of Macro-Lepidoptera inhabiting Guernsey and Sark. By W. A. Luff, Esq. (Continued from vol. vii. p. 48.) I Beg to offer the enclosed additions to my former lists of Guernsey insects for publication in the Entomologist. The following were, when not stated to the contrary, captured during 1874. Lampides Bcelica.--A single specimen was captured by Miss L. Henouf in her garden, St. Peter Port, Guernsey, at the end of August, 1872. This lady also captured eight specimens at the same place in the autumn of 1859. Sphinx Convolvuli.--Several have occurred in

Sark. Deilephila Euphorbia.--I am sorry I cannot now record...
